CONSEQUENCES

- The international legal rules do not require a special act of reception to be applied in the domestic law
- Existence of a certain relationship between the international law and the domestic law. Primacy of the I.L. over the domestic one
- The State violating a binding international norm incurs international responsibility
- The legal authority of the States is not a delegation of powers

ISSUES CONCERNING THIS RELATION

- From the point of view of international law, the international norms prevail over the internal norms in the event of any conflict, as they have been recognized by the international Courts of Justice
- From the point of view of domestic law, the norms contrary to inter. law shall be valid and continue in force, until such time as the legislative assembly amends or derogates them, which means that the State is under obligation to compensate for the harm caused
